France eral skirmishers falling back, and a few minutes later the Confederate line of battle in which were conspicuously seen the Lexington Cadets with their institute colors waving over them, all boys from 14 to 18 years of age, going for the first time into battle, came into view about a mile distant. The line was over-a mile long, and they marched steadily and quickly forward, keeping well dressed west to east, and every few seconds giving utterance to the well known "Rebel

The Federal battories waited until the distance between the opposing lines were reduced to less than half a mile, and then all at once opened fire. The first round appeared to stagger them, but they quickly rallied, corrected the confusion, and charged straight for the batteries, in the meantime pouring in a close and concentrated fire. The Federal guns now opened upon them with grape and canister, and the infantry began to pour in its musketry fire and in a few moments one of the closest and most determined battles of the war, according to the numbers engaged; was under headway. It was observed that the Confederates made but one charge in this battle, and that was the first. The most heroic efforts on the part of the Federals could not break the impetus of this charge. The Confederate line, it is true, balted several times, but only to pour in a more concentrated musketry fire .-The artillerymen of Carlin's battery flitted through the smoke and flame of their guns like demons, while at every discharge of their pieces, the earth would quake, and immense gaps would be torn in the Confederate lines but they would close them up again with military precision, the living stepping into the places of the dying and the dead, and once more march on, while high above all the roar and craze of the fight could be heard the shrill rebel cry of the Lexington Cadets -Fully one-third of these brave boys were killed or carried from the field severely

All a moment for this one." The speaker was a middle aged gentleman, Mr. Morton, who was rapidly writing the address on some letters. The one waiting was a clerk in the estabishment of Morton & Co, Tremont street, corner of Dover, B ston. "It is necessary for these to be mailed tonight to go in the first train to P. in the

Yes sir," and the quick-motioned, handme youth of nineteen, went to the nearest letter box and deposited them therein. Mr. Morton looked up from a pile of letters he was perusing as Byron Forsythe entered at his summons. "I received no receipt for the money you mailed last Tuesday evening. Did you make no mistake?" eyeurned respectfully, the rich blood mounting to his cheek as he comprehended that he was inder suspicion. "Strange," muttered Mr. Morton. "War-en is always punctual - never knew careless-nan in Providence and mailed it. The next day he received an answer that gain summoned his young clerk. "Do you still maintain that you mailed the etter all right?' "I do, sir." Again the blood rushed pain-fully to his face, at the imputation. Mr. Morton, eyeing him suspiciously through his glasses, thought it a proof of guilt. "I have written to Warren, and he informs me that he never received the money. You see, sir, under the circumstances, I can hardly trust you. You may be innocent, but it looks suspicious. I cannot retain you unless I lave complete confidence in you. I do not say Baltimore, and will reside there this winter.

— Gen. G. J. Pillow, of Mexican war no dark, sir, dark." And Byron Forsythe, with his proud, sensitive nature stung to the quick by the unju-t suspicion, went out of the employ of Morton & Co., with his scanty earnings in his pocket, to seek employment Two policemen belonging station 5. Boston, met at the junction of their respective beats, corner of Tremont and Dover streets, about 3 o'clock A. M. Themselves in a shadow, they "spotted" a man standing at the nearest letter-box, seemingly engaged in something questionable. After glancing hastily around, and discovering no one in the dim star light, he unlocked the box and transferred the contents to his pockets. He repeated the process at the next box. When he reached the third box the officers, who had followed stealthily, concluded that the situation was ripe, and surprised him with a heavy hand on each shoulder, demanding what he was about. "Mailing a letter," he said, readily resting the inference. "Can't a fellow-" "A letter, yes. Let us see the contents of your pockets Finding himself cornered, he produced a handful of letters. · Sorry, but we will have to invite you to talk a walk with us." And, forming a squad of honer, they escorted him to the police sta tion. He seemed to have something in his hand that he wished to be rid of. They gave way purposely, and soon heard a slight lick on the pavement Not easily baffled, a strarp search with matches brought a duplicate key to light. Arriving at the lockup they relieved him of the letters and left him to his

"The man whom officers White and Patterson arrested for robbing letter-boxes, has confessed that it was not his first offense. -A quantity of mail matter has been found with him, among which he owns he found Mr Morton rode down to the office. Ask-his eyes over them, and was not much surprised to find the ones he had given to his clerk to mail that Tuesday evening. The money had, of course, been abstracted, the envelope having been carefully opened at one end, and it still contained the note that had accompanied the money.

"Never knew such a thing before," thought Mr Morton as he tode homeward. "Thro' this piece of rascality I have turned off Forsythe Wish I knew where he is. It did look suspicious, though," trying to ease his conscience, which told him he had been Veronica Morton made a lovely picture as she sat under the subdued gas-light in her warm, bright sitting room, idly dreaming Footsteps in the hall, and "Oh, papa, you have come; you are later than usual," was the greeting that Mr. Morton received as he entered. His careworn face relaxed from its drawn lines as the girl put her arms around his neck and kissed him. They passed into the supper room, with its bright silver and dainty china.

"What is the matter, papa?" asked she, noticing that he looked unusually thought-

He hesitated a moment, then told her the story of his dismissal of the young clerk, and the finale. A look of intense sympathy overspread her face. "Oh, papa, how dreadfully he must have felt to be so unjustly suspected. I saw him a few times. He looked too good and nobie to do anything mean. Don't you think you could find him?"

"I am afraid not, dear, but I am going to do what I can." And when Veronica laid her head on her pillow that night the face of that tall, hands some youth with fearless blue eves and fair, broad brow, who was under the shadow of a suspicion, haunted her dreams. She had never guessed that the vision of radiant loveliness that had appeared once or wice in her father's office, in jaunty hat and velvet, was indelibly engraved on the memry of Byron Forsythe. the high-spirited, wagged on. The crowds on the thronged sidewalks stopped and held their breath; teams and turn-suts tried to clear the way as a runaway horse came galleping up Tremont street, champing his bit and foaming. The driver, who was slightly intoxicated, had completely loss control of him. There was no one brave enough to attempt the rescue, and the carriage was in momentary danger of being overturned, when some one leaped from the crowd, caught at the bridle of the excited animal, and clung to him with a desperate grip. He was dragged along a short distance, getting terribly bruised and then others esme to the rescue, and he was taken up insonsible from the feet of the horse, that stood panting and steaming, but conquered. The occupants of the carriage were a lady and a gentleman, whose white faces showed the terrible fright they had experienced. "Bring him here," said the lady's sweet, silvery voice, as they hesitated what to do with the man. "We are almost home," "My God!" exclaimed Mr. Morton-for

"Have we killed him ?" Byron Forsythe was unconscious that the little gloved hand, which he would have counted a happiness to touch, was resting gently up-

The best medical aid was summoned, and he was soon restored to consciousness. No prince could have been tendered more carefully than be, lying in a darkened chamber whose rich, soft carpet nuffled every sound. He had a skilled nurse, but Veronica herself often southed his restlessness. In spite of careful nursing a fever ensued. His wild ravings of unjust suspicion and hopeless love chilled the hearts of his listeners. Veronica prayed that he might live to know that his innocence had been proved, and her father. who had just come up from the borders of death, longed for reason to return, that he might atone to the sensitive soul for the injustice. The boon was granted. One afternoon he opened his eyes to see Veronica's lovely face bending over him, not radiant and animated, as he had first seen it, but suffused with tender sympathy. "You here? Where am I? It was your father who suspected me of--" he said, "Cau you forgive me, my boy? I was hasty. I proved your innocence long sgo. Will you give me your hand?" said Mr. Morton, who stood there. "You almost gave your life for ours;" said Veronica, in a faltering tone, reaching out her hand also, which he carried reverently to his lips. And Byron Forsythe, the junior partner in the firm of Morton & Co., and the happy husband of Veronica, is a firm believer in the doctine that "misfortunes are blessings terrible in the thought of having our friends stricken down at our side, without a parting word of endearment or consolation-one moment at our side in the flush of vigorous life, cheering our hearts with their loving sympathy ; the next st our feet, pale with death, deaf to our cries and heedless of our tears .-Every excessively fat person is in instant danger of such a death. Seven-tenths of the victims of obesity die of heart disease or apoplexy. Allan's Anti-Fat, the only remedy for obesity, reduces the weight by regulating the digestion and assimilation of the food. It is perfectly harmless, and its use will insure, in every instance, a reduction of weight from two to five pounds a week.
